MANAGER'S COMMENTARY

In April, onshore China 10-year government bond yield climbed 5bps to 2.83% as market expects more expansionary fiscal policies to support economy. The Omicron breakout in cities such as Shanghai and the subsequent lockdown has weighed on economic growth, especially on domestic consumption, which accounts for ~65% of China's GDP growth. Data released in April such as fixed asset investment, net export and total social financing were relatively stable, but retail sales saw the first monthly decline (-3.5% yoy in March) since Jul2020. The April manufacturing PMI also weakened further to 47.4 from 49.5 in March. China's top policy-making body, the Politburo, held a meeting on Apr29, maintaining the GDP target of 5.5% and pledging to use all kinds of monetary policy tools. In particular, it emphasized the use of quantitative measures to create credits and increase liquidity. We think it would be challenging for China to reach the growth target barring any meaningful monetary stimulus and therefore believe there is still room for the domestic rates to go lower. We have extended the fund duration from 5.5 years to 6.7 years in April, comparing with the benchmark of 5.9 years.

On currency front, RMB weakened further against USD in April. Since 2Q2020, RMB has outperformed USD and a basket of currencies because of 1) resilient economic growth thanks to well-contained domestic COVID situation and intact supply chains; 2) prudent monetary policies while DM countries conducted massive easing; and 3) steady foreign capital inflow and large trade surplus. In the past few months, some of these supporting factors started to peter out. Therefore, we think the recent movement in USDCNH is not surprising and regard it as a healthy two-way fluctuation. Looking ahead, while RMB may still face headwind in the short term, we think the medium-to-long term outlook stays robust. China sovereign bond should continue to be attractive for global investors given its low correlation with DM rates and still positive real yield after adjusting for core inflation. The foreign outflow in the onshore CNY bond market has stabilized since mid-March, and virtually muted in April so far. Last but not least, recent news such as Saudi Arabia considering accepting RMB in its oil sales and Israel adding RMB into their central bank reserves show that the de-dollarization starts to trend and RMB's path towards becoming a global reserve currency remains intact.
